Boston University believes in the power of education to elevate, nurture, and transform. While all college students grow as they engage in new ways of thinking, the impact of education is especially evident in prison. Rigorous study gives prisoners the intellectual leverage they need to revise their view of themselves and leave prison better equipped to contribute positively to their families and communities.

The Healthy Baby/Healthy Child Program (HBHC) is a community-based program designed to promote infant survival, positive birth outcomes, oral health, and family unity. The HBHC program provides home visiting to pregnant and parenting families with a child under age of five who reside in Boston. All services are free, voluntary, and confidential. Public health nurses, public health advocates, and social workers help prepare parents (via a strength-based model) for healthy deliveries and successful parenting within the scope of their own culture and language. Clients are linked to a range of services and health care facilities.

MASSACHUSETTS-CURE
Advocacy on behalf of the federal inmate population is the central focus of Federal CURE, Inc. (FedCURE). Realizing that successful advocacy can only occur when society has been enlightened about federal prison reality, FedCURE seeks to create a paradigm where elected officials and American society have a clear understanding of the issues confronted by the federal inmate population. Reducing crime in our communities requires society's involvement so that the federal criminal justice system can effectively address escalating crime rates through the adoption of alternative sentencing options in the federal court system; facilitate transitional services during reintegration into the community; and reintroduce effective rehabilitative programming into the federal prison system thus engendering positive changes in the lives of those incarcerated within.

identification/drivers licenses, health insurance, shelter, transportation, or an interim job, as well as long-term issues, such as substance abuse treatment, mental health treatment, education, or permanent housing.

On the day of release, the facility arranges for either a family member or a case manager to meet the individual at the door. After release, participants are encouraged to continue to work with their case manager and social service providers while reentering the community. For those inmates who leave jail on conditional supervision, such as probation, the supervising agency usually incorporates participation in BRI as part of their stipulation of release. Participants can receive supervision and support services through a local day reporting center. The case managers provide support to offenders for up to 18 months post release.
