How Prisoners Can Obtain their GED and High School Diploma
Most (70%) American prisoners have not completed high school, which is the first step they must take if they wish to pursue higher education. Inmates who don't have their high school diploma are required to participate in GED courses in their prison's Education Department. The GED is the official high school diploma equivalent, and prisoners who refuse to participate in their GED are actually subject to sanctions, including incident reports if they refuse to go to class once enrolled.
High School Diploma Correspondence
While having a GED does qualify prisoners for advanced education, it places the GED recipient at a significant disadvantage since it doesn't fully cover the various subjects someone would learn in a regular high school.
It is highly recommended that if possible, prisoners pursue an actual high school diploma through a correspondence program or take college preparatory courses to better prepare them for higher levels of education.
High school diploma correspondence programs allow prisoners to earn a real high school diploma by taking real high school classes through the mail. If a prisoner dropped out of school as a Junior or a Senior, it should only take a year or so to complete the coursework, and it will help prepare them for the rigors of college-level study.
